Did You Know?

Parents consistently cite summer as the most difficult time to ensure that their children have productive things to do. (Duffett et al. 2004).

Studies show that children involved in a summer reading program gain significant vocabulary, socializing, and even self-disciplined learning skills during this time. They're more apt to learn during this period, as the pressure of full-time school and other events is no longer apparent. (The Johns Hopkins University's Center for Summer Learning).

The School Library Journal reports that "about 33% of summer reading participants are more likely to read above grade level."
